Zenchilada the Mag Makes Its Debut

Food magazines are dead and dustbin bound. We all know that to be true.

Zenchilada, a digital mag, which just published its first issue, begs to differ.

Published out of Santa Fe, New Mexico, and edited by Ronni Lundy, a rock star of a scribe who made her bones in Kentucky, writing about the food and music of Appalachia, Zenchilada offers a broad view of culinary culture.

Ronni's take on food is inclusive. In this first issue she surveys peoples and places where corn matters.

Marilou Awiakta, the Cherokee poet, gets her say. So does a corn smut fetishist. And Matt Rowley, a moonshine historian. Corncob wine is on offer. And so are cornmeal cookies, baked in the Italian tradition.

Zenchilada, which publishes articles with mellifluous titles like "Whole Lot of Slakin Going On," is a hopeful shot across the bow at those pessimists who believe that smart words and good food are no longer copacetic partners. Read it.

I do peruse Epicurious and occasionally some blog or other I've been directed to but other than that I still prefer real paper cookbooks and food mags. I guess someone forgot to tell me, who knew?
